

The culmination of a semester-long "re-pioneering" project drew positive reactions from speakers at the reception.

Nebraska Gov. Dave Heineman said he liked the possibility that the students' "outside the box" thinking could have a positive impact on rural communities.

An "ability to work together," very evident among Nebraskans reception.

UNL Dean of Architecture Wayne Drummond also congratulated both the students and the community on a successful project. He said it was "a privilege to work with the people of Albion and Boone County."

Paul Hosford, who with his wife, Lori, was a leader of the "re-pioneering" project, said the

RECEPTION SPEAKERS -- Paul Hosford gives remarks during Thursday's reception. Looking on are UNL architecture student Katie Johnston, Gov. Dave Heineman and Albion City Administrator Andy Devine.

able to

The
cepts f
area, wi
energy
the use
also em
history,
and we

The
restaur
theatre,
ments a
center,
train st

And
tor, said
help Al
munitie
attracti
young

"I he
gious,"
us an what A century

The
on dis
through said he
be arra
Albion